MANDY JOHNSTON

ARTIST STATEMENT AND BIOGRAPHY

I am a multidisciplinary artist. I work mainly with alternative materials, alternative photographic and printmaking techniques and experiential sculptural installation. Through my work I explore human connectivity and the fragility of existence. I employ contextual and traditional definitions attributed to materials to support these themes. For example, I often use copper wire to suggest information and energy transfer, bridging both raw material value and information value systems.

Because I am interested in contradictions and binaries I consider how something has been defined by its antithesis or the possibility of its absence and how this shifts its value and meaning. Absence often create possibility, a once filled space for example becomes open and vulnerable to be absorbed, used, ignored or quoted. Absences are also that which exists "unseen", such as light and shadow. Elements like fire and transferred shadows bring concepts of transience and memory to the forefront of my experiential sculptural installations.

I am currently exploring alternative possibilities for rites of passage and the lack thereof in my societal context. I am asking questions around the possibility of alternative support structures to institutionalised ones and ways we can better support each other through transitions in life.

Mandy Johnston (b.1978) is a multidisciplinary artist who works with alternative materials, experiential sculptural installation, alternative photographic, film and printmaking techniques. Her passion for sharing knowledge has led her to be involved in artist-led initiatives, to develop and present professional practice workshops and to mentor artists within her practice.

Johnston received her MFA from the University of the Witwatersrand(2003), a Marteinssen merit award for installation(1998 and 1999), was a Sasol New Signatures finalist(1999, 2010) and an ABSA L'Atelier finalist(1999,2012), Ithuba trust award(2012), was a PPC Young Sculptors Awards finalist(2011,2015), was presented as the festival artist of the Klein Karoo National Art festival(2019).

Johnston presented her first solo exhibition is 2012 and has presented 5 more since, most recently showing at Everard Reed, Circa Cape Town in 2024 and AfrikaBurn 2025. Johnston's work is part of multiple corporate and private collections Including RMB and ABSA.

Johnston's work was part of Berman Contemporary's inaugural exhibition, Contours Unveiled. Johnston exhibited at Investec Cape Town Art Fair with Berman Contemporary and worked towards her new solo with the gallery.

GATHERER

To enter Mandy Johnston's work is to encounter a field of slowed attention where perception sharpens through quiet, material transformation. Meaning accumulates gradually. It is gathered. The installations hum, flicker and shift, drawing attention to processes that often unfold beyond immediate perception. These are spaces of transition, where matter softens, form destabilises and the visible meets its underlying conditions.

Johnston locates herself within a transitional middle phase, where the intensity of fire continues to shape the work while gestures of emergence begin to surface. Within this in-between, gathering becomes a way of processing, repositioning and preparing for what follows. Materials are gathered and reworked, holding both physical trace and energetic memory.

Working within a cyclical understanding of time, Johnston situates gathering as a moment that follows rupture and precedes renewal. It is a space of recouping, where what remains is revalued. Like soil enriched by ash, the aftermath becomes fertile. The installations function as responsive environments that hold ambiguity, tension and transition. They invite a sustained engagement with transformation as an ongoing condition. In this space, gathering becomes a way of holding what has been while making space for what is still to come.

CONTOURS UNVEILED

When I started working toward this body of work I was thinking about human connection and shared experience. What I came to is the thought that the only truly shared experience of life is that of being within or part of an organism. What sets humanity apart from other organisms is the ability to imagine, choose and create. So, we are essentially conceptual beings, navigating a physical realm. We are conduits of thought and makers of meaning. For the pieces, the material that burns is steel wool. It is metaphorically representative of our organism. We believe it to be indestructible but, in this form, it is incredibly fragile just as our bodies are. These sculptures burn to highlight the fragility of life and try to make sense of the transitions we go through. I see this process as a rite of passage.

CONDUIT I

"We are conduits of thought and makers of meaning"

Where I live, on the South Peninsula of the Western cape there are seasonal wildfires that simultaneously give and take life. They threaten and destroy homes and compromise the food sources of local wildlife, yet they are necessary for rejuvenation of ecosystems, and are essential for the survival of the fynbos. The protea plant, for instance, is dependent on this cycle as the fire triggers the release of its seeds. The seed then benefits from the nutrient-rich soil created by the fire. Interestingly, almost reverently no new protea grows on the exact site of its predecessor. Their absences are reminders of these catastrophic and life affirming events.

Just as the fynbos relies on fire for rebirth, we often need to relinquish the remnants of the past to progress. Our bodies, in this metaphor, are the conduits, through which our thoughts and experiences traverse, embodying both our role as navigators of our lives and passengers within our physical forms.

Life within or part of an organism is the only universal experience that connects all living things. What sets humanity apart from other organisms is the ability to imagine, choose and create. If the question is survival, I think the answer should be found through the lens of regeneration versus expiration. One that is cognisant of the reason for the destructive forces and not based in fear or ignorance of them. Incorporating a cyclical understanding of existence that it is regenerative.

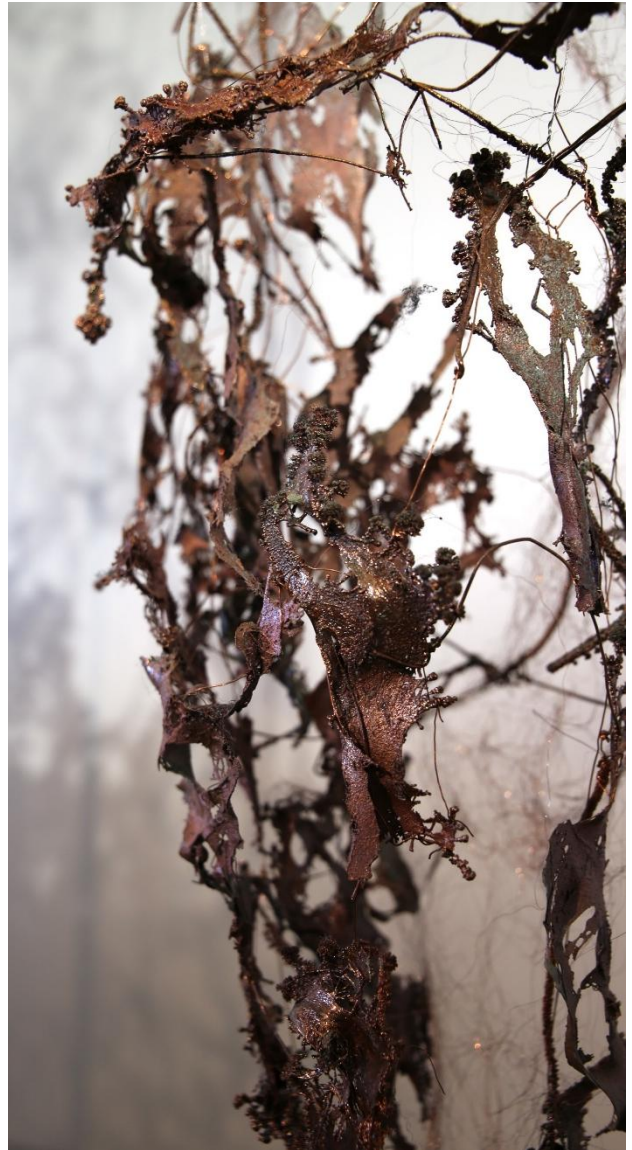

Note: Steelwool as a material metaphor for our organism.

CONDUIT II

The title refers to the idea that we are more than our material beings. We are conduits of thought and makers of meaning. We have the ability to construct and navigate our realities. We are not cultural passengers because we can choose and create and effect intentional change.

Conduit II is a body of work that is presented with intention of generating conversation around poignant moments of transition in our lives and about community support. This work poses questions about how we can reenvision formalised rites of passage ceremonies to better support each other.

I observe and think for valid reasons in many cases that there has been a move away from traditional, ceremonial ways of marking important moments in our lives. Shifts in traditions are important as contexts and cultural values shift in society. The challenge with total negation of these rites is that all the peripheral support and teaching and support structures are being simultaneously minimised. The result as I see it is that people are turning more often to institutionalised services for these supports instead of fellow community members.

Each of the figures presented transitioned in material form in some way throughout the course of the week. Each were effected by it and showing visible signs of it

COIR.

Made with coir. This work looks at material value systems. In Polynesia coir is a prized material because it is very salt resistant. In South Africa we use it to line hanging baskets for and carpets. For the drawing work I burned coir and made ink with the ash, I then spent 54 days redrawing the rope I burned. In doing so subverting the value system based on material coir on for and converting it into another time and art. The ball of coir contains gold.

HINDSIGHT

I am formally interested in the use of alternative materials as well as the contextual values, definitions and symbolisms attributed to them. I enjoy researching the physical world and finding interesting connections and contradictions in the values attributed to objects and materials. My work is informed by specific historical and cultural context. Things are often defined by their antithesis and that the formation of a value is often around the threat of absence or the obvious presence of it. There is pain or fear associated with absence, with a thing that once filled space both literally or figuratively, now open and vulnerable to be absorbed, used, ignored or quoted.

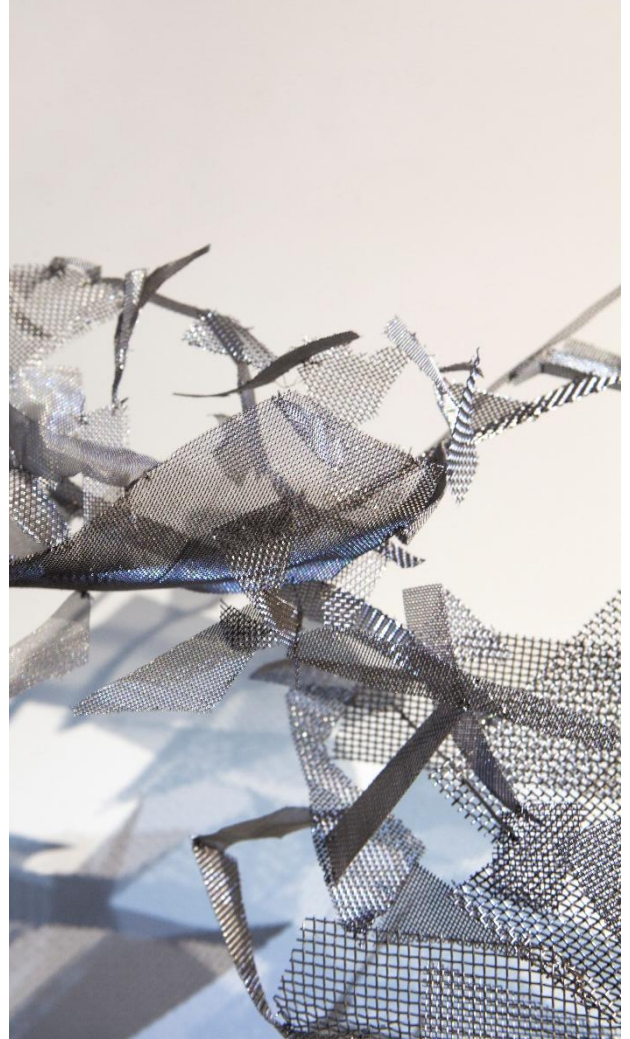

Further than this I am driven by a passion for sharing knowledge. These works are the product of my thoughts around the topic of tradition and object making as ritual. I consider reasons for what has been kept and what has been passed on. Passed on meaning both overlooked or swept aside and in antitheses, collected and given showing within recent generations. The humour is subtle and intentional. The fetishized, sentimentalised and distorted forms mirror the attribution of value to both materials and aesthetics I observe practiced in much of contemporary visual art today.

IN THE PRESENCE OF ABSENCE

'Absence suggests experience and traces are its subtle cues that reveal this in our environments and points to the existence of something that is no longer present. There are often feelings of loss, nostalgia or fear associated with absence'.

This body of work explores ideas surrounding governance and the negotiation of space through materials and how the materiality of objects are used to speak dually about an intimate and collective formation/fabrication of value. The materials used in constructing the works are particular to the idea of the temporary and transient understanding of space. Where the materials become shadows of themselves and through the artist's intervention carry a secretive history of their origin and the subject matter that is explored through the process of manipulation, formation and fabrication.

These works become keys to very intimate, personal experiences of the boundaries created by presence and absence, mirroring broader societal, political and existential issues. The exhibition speaks about the physical, conceptual and metaphorical negotiations of space through the ideas contained in the physical, emotional and cognitive understanding of land, borders and boundary lines as well as the ownership of land and the power to construct boundary lines. The ideas explored in In the presence of absence are not revolutionary; they are, however, current, basic and inherent in the human condition.

WHAT DEMOLISH MEANT

Bricks/ fragments of cement counterweighted on a gut by candles, hung over a beam. The 'candles'/wax block with wick will be lit. As they melt the bricks will begin to move because the weight is shifted. There will be a box of candles available to viewers to add to the container. If the viewers do not add to the candle the bricks will fall.

Conceptually, I am playing with ideas of construction, deconstruction and how we as users of spaces in effect cause them to be, not only as they are but what they are and what they represent. We are responsible for how the materials 'hang' together and the formations they take on. This is referred to by the box of candles available for use to the viewer. I am interested to see if people will actively add to the installation or allow it to fall. A metaphor for the studio space.

In using these materials, I am referring to the history of this area, the fact that it is the original site being Brickfields was destroyed by fire and a warehouse area was built. As the original site of rejuvenation in the city that in effect means that something was lost and something gained.

I am intrigued by the notion that this building is considered demolished by the city of Johannesburg. I am playing with fire literally- the threat of the candles moving higher toward the wooden beams will refer to this.

RESTRAINT

In this work Mandy Johnston used the dog collar shape and filled with images of scorched South African farmland (a necessity for fertile soil but also a defense against fire) hidden in the image of the earth are images of people who were victims of xenophobic attacks. Their scorched bodies still soldering. Titled Restraint the work urges that there be restraint of urge to reopen wounds in order to heal. That sometimes we need to endure discomfort to progress and in time to rejuvenate.
